About this talk

In April of 2019, a historic meeting took place at the Pearl Harbor Visitor Center on Oahu between Japanese Atomic Bomb Survivors and American Pearl Harbor Survivors. “Sakura & Pearls: Healing from World War II” is the documentary that exclusively captured the stories of how they survived and what they want the future generations to know. It all started when American filmmaker G. K. Hunter visited the Atomic Dome in Hiroshima, Japan where he met his first Atomic Bomb Survivor named Okihiko Terao-san. After hearing Terao-san talk about surviving the A-Bomb as a 4 year old child, Hunter interviewed him on camera, which bloomed into a feature length documentary. How did Terao-san survive the first atomic bomb?

About Kamana Hunter

G. K. Hunter is a Director and Writer who shares inspiring stories of forgiveness to show the future generations that we can mend the scars of history. Hunter believes that by learning how to forgive our past wars, we empower ourselves to prevent future wars. He began his career as a facilitator of multi-cultural workshops, helping such groups as Jewish Holocaust

Survivors and Native Americans find healing from the after effects of their family history. Hunter’s groundbreaking work has been chronicled in his book “Healing Our Bloodlines: The 8 Realizations of Generational Liberation”. It was a natural progression to capture the work he had been doing for the past 15 years on camera in his documentary “Sakura & Pearls: Healing from World War II” in an effort inspire the next generations of upcoming leaders and facilitators. In his writing and directing, Hunter continues to focus on the theme of healing World War II, because he sees it as a monumental stress test that measures humanity’s capacity to forgive some of the most heinous historical events. If we can forgive the ‘unforgivable’, then there is hope that we can stop.
